Does the catch-up effect with universal HPV vaccination in the elderly at risk of cervical cancer also apply to screening programs? When screening for cervical cancer, the age to perform and the interval between screening tests should be based on the best compromise between sensitivity and specificity. In the age range in which a woman has the highest risk of cervical cancer, age-specific sensitivity of the Pap test and the HPV test for detecting precancer and cervical cancer is increased. However, a woman's risk of developing cancer increases as she ages, and therefore age-specific sensitivity is reduced. This study evaluates the effect of universal HPV vaccination on cervical cancer incidence, which is the aim of the National Program for Cervical Cancer Prevention, in the context of screening programs in both sexes. As the universal HPV vaccination program reaches the age group of women at highest risk of developing cervical cancer, the effect of this vaccination program on the time interval between two subsequent Pap tests (catch-up effect) should be analyzed. A retrospective cohort study of women undergoing screening tests for the prevention of cervical cancer was performed. Women 82157476af
